community, and they helped to establish a number of important institutions. Their legacy continues to live on in the community of Fredericksburg, Texas.

The Founding of the Fürstenverein

The Fürstenverein was founded in 1834 by a group of German intellectuals and businessmen. The society's goal was to promote immigration to Texas. The Fürstenverein was led by Prince Carl of Solms-Braunfels, who was a cousin of the German king at the time. Prince Carl was a strong supporter of Texas independence, and he saw the Fürstenverein as a way to help the new republic grow and prosper.

The Fürstenverein quickly gained support from a number of German intellectuals and businessmen. The society's members included Friedrich von Gerstner, a prominent engineer and inventor; Ferdinand von Roemer, a geologist and naturalist; and Hermann Ehrenberg, a historian and geographer. The Fürstenverein also received support from the German government, which saw the society as a way to promote German interests in Texas.

In 1844, the Fürstenverein sent a group of agents to Texas to select a site for a new colony. The agents chose a tract of land in the Texas Hill Country, which was located between the cities of San Antonio and Austin. The land was fertile and well-watered, and it was also located near a number of German settlements. The agents named the new colony the Colony of the German Fürstenverein.
