The story of California rice began in earnest in the late 19th century, when Chinese immigrants introduced the crop to the Sacramento Valley. With their knowledge of rice cultivation, they transformed the region's landscape into a vast expanse of shimmering paddies.

As the demand for rice soared, so did the industry. Japanese immigrants played a vital role in developing California's rice farming techniques, introducing innovative methods such as water-leveling and seed selection.

Daddy Got Dirt: An Iconic Brand

Among the pioneers of California rice was R.H. "Daddy" Reed, a farmer from Arkansas who relocated to the Golden State in 1946. With his determination and unwavering belief in the power of agriculture, Reed established the Daddy Got Dirt brand.
